HE SHOT HIMSELF

Ever since his wife died, two months ago. Louis H. Stroh, a wealthy plumbing contractor, has been despondent. A few days ago the wife of his son, Albert J. Stroh, a policeman, died suddenly, and this second blow increased his gloom. He had been ill also.

About noon to-day he rose from bed in his home at No. 1012 Lind avenue, Highbridge, the Bronx, and wrote several letters which he sealed in envelopes, then addressing the envelopes, then addressing the envelopes to various members of his family.

Then, still in his night garments, he stood before a mirror and stot himself over the right ear with a heavy revolver. He dropped to the floor, dying almost instantly.

His daughter-in-law, Mrs. R. Stroh, beard the shot and found the body. The suicide was fifty-three years old. He owned three plumbing shops on the lower was two seconds over the record.

Ignoring the provisions of the statute which they had gone to Gravesend track to enforce, the police late this afternoon inaugurated the policy of arresting not only the men who took bets but the men who were alleged to have wagered them.

A patrol wagon reached the Coney Island station half full of prisoners. Leon Cohen, of No. 546 Lexington avenue, was charged with accepting a bet from Lawrence Daly, of No. 445 West Fifty-sixth street. Both men were held at the station.

Similar charges were made against Paul Bert, of No. 242 West Fortieth street, and John Jones, of No. 710 Ninth avenue. Bert was said to have booked a $10 bet for Jones on the fourth race.

Harry Summers, of No. 232 West Forty-third street, and Morris Gold, of No. 175 Mermaid avenue, Coney Island, were charged with showing women in the grand stand programmes with the prices entered opposite the names of the horses.
